Whose Music Education Is It?
The role of the student voice

Edited by John Finney and Chris Harrison

Contents

Foreword

Notes on the contributors

Introduction

Section 1: What is ‘The Student Voice’?

Introduction
International perspectives on the students’ voices movement: sonorities in a changing world Julia Flutter
Using student research to understand and improve musical learning Pamerla Burnard & Cecilia Björk

Section 2: The Student Voice in Shaping the Curriculum

Introduction
Co-construction of a curriculum in Nottingham City Ian Burton
Learning to listen to the voices of my students Jenny Shervington
Using student consultation to enhance attitudes towards class singing Eleanor Vessey

Section 3: The Student as Researcher

Introduction
To what extent does participation in extra-curricular music affect the future aspirations of 11-12 year olds? Eleanor Denny
Children and teacher as researchers investigating engagement in the primary music curriculum Elizabeth Kelly
Young people as researchers and campaigners – Save the Children’s ‘Inspiring Change’ programme Rachel Laurence

Section 4: The Student as Leader and Mentor

Introduction
Students mentoring students: can it work in the classroom? Anthony Anderson
Students as leaders in music John Finney
Students in control of teaching and learning: a lesson from Joseph Lancaster Eivind Lodemel
From culture clash to social cohesion Rebecca Lewis
Students leading ensembles James Thomas

Section 5

Introduction
How the student voice is heard through online social networking David Ashworth
Listening to the voices of students with severe learning difficulties Alex Ivanovich
Student leadership in Arts Award projects Michael Quinn
Democracy and Identity: educating the student voice James Garnett
Teaching for Flow: students’ subjective responses to their experiences in the music classroom Catherine Preston
University music students talking about their experiences of learning to lead peer-directed singing groups Liz Mellor

Appendices